Not illustrated. 1774 Excerpt: ...distressing the service. In the expectation of two thousand effective soldiers to be constantly kept here, the inhabitants expended near 100,000/. in building barracks for their accommodation; which are so disposed among the different parishes, that they are calculated to afford a general protection to the internal parts, and capable of holding more than that number of men, besides their officers. But, in 1764, when the 49th and 74th regiments were relieved, the people had the mortification to find, that, instead of two regiments of one thousand men each, they were to be protected by two of four hundred and fifty each; which was less than one half the complement they expected; and consequently their barracks, on which they had laid out such large sums of money, raised by taxes, which fell very heavily on the planters, for three years, were left to moulder into decay, for want of being tenanted. The smallest number that ought be cantoned here, for the internal security of the island in time of peace, is an establishment of one thousand and thirty-five effectives, to be distributed according to the plan hereafter described; by which, every one of the new barracks would be garrisoned, and kept from going to decay; and the guard so well balanced in the respective counties and parishes, in proportion to the danger they may severally be exposed to from sudden insurrections, as would probably be an effectual curb upon the mutinous and disaffected. But, to form a body for this establishment, either two reduced regiments should be raised to five hundred and twenty-five men each; or one regiment, under the name of the Royal American, be compleated to one thousand and thirty-five men. In time of war, if government should judge two regiments necessary for the better de...
