I Don't Believe in Hocus Pocus Crockett Trotter

"I Don't Believe in Hocus Pocus" is what Crockett Trotter used to tell people when they would ask him if he believed in God, although he was raised in the Godly environment of an African American gospel church. When he lost his beloved wife, his lifetime love of 38 years, to cancer, she left him with two grown daughters and instructions to pay off their home with the insurance money after her death. Crockett assured his wife that would be done. But after her death, one thing led to another, and he had not paid off the house as he had promised. On April 1, 2013, ten months after Crockett's wife passed away, he woke up in bed and found that her spirit had possessed his body. She wouldn't let go until he paid off the house. When he finally did, he was sitting alone in his house in a kitchen chair, and he suddenly found himself out-of-body, in the realm of spirit, where the love was thick as mud. This is his incredible story, revealing insights to all of us about the afterlife, God, and how we should live.
